Mrs. John Wallenhaupt received the following clipping a few days ago in which her grandsons, of Dubuque, Ia., are mentioned as youthful airplane builders. Al and Leo Wallenhaupt, two youths residing at 1113 Main St., have completed a working model, a Wright biplane, the same being on exhibition at the Carnegie-Stout Library, where it is attracting considerable attention and is the subject of much favorable comment. It seems the youngsters have given considerable time to mechanics and became so enthusiastic over the recent aviation meet held in this city that they decided to try their hand at a baby Wright machine. The model measures about three feet in width, is about the same length from tip to tail and is perfectly balanced. Its planes and supports are in keeping with those used in a real Wright biplane, and altogether the model is a practical example of youthful genius.

There was no courtship among the Romans, marriage being arranged by parents. Betrothed persons did not even usually see each other till they came together to be married. One day an uncle of Culpurnia came to the farm and, after an interview with her father, it was announced to Culpurnia that a marriage had been arranged for her. This lifted a burden from her shoulders, but cast her into gloom, because she had come to love the young man who had loaned the money for the taxes. All she was told of him she was to marry was that he had some means, belonged to her own class and was not much older than herself. His name was Marcellus.

When the day for the betrothal came round a chariot stopped at the farm, and the groom came into the house attended by a large retinue. As he entered the room where his bride awaited him dressed in wedding costume she started a deep blush came upon her cheek, and her eyes lighted with pleasure. In Marcellus she recognized the young man who had loaned the money.

After the betrothal ceremony came the preparations for the wedding, and after the two were made man and wife Marcellus took his spouse to his own home. Culpurnia was surprised at their taking the road to the Fabian castle, and when they began to ascend the hill she asked where they went.

"To the home recently occupied by my father, who till his death was Lucius Fabius. I am Marcellus Fabius his son and heir. From the moment I first saw you I resolved that instead of your being sold into slavery you should be my wife."

Culpurnia

A Story of Ancient Rome

By F. A. MITCHEL

Copyright by American Press Association, 1911

Shortly before the breaking down of the Roman empire there was a class of small farmers who were being eaten up by large landholders. This class, called Curiales, had formerly been one of the governing elements of Rome and was considered very honorable. But becoming impoverished they were constantly selling out to or evading under the protection of those persons who held thousands of acres where they held but a few.

There was in one of the Roman provinces a family, the Fabii, who had accumulated a very large landed estate. Lying at the foot of a hill on which stood the castle of Lucius Fabius, lived one of the Curiales, Fabius, whose affairs were getting late very bad shape. Sidonius was an old man and had but one child, a daughter, Culpurnia. One day her father called her into the atrium or living room of their dwelling and said to her:

"My daughter, we must sell our farm. Like so many of our class, I have found it impossible to keep my head financially above water. In a few days I, being a tax collector, must return to the government the taxes levied upon my district and am required to fill from my own purse any deficiency that the people cannot pay. Go to the castle and tell Fabius that I am ready to accept the sum he has offered me for my property. This will enable me to make up the deficiency."

"But, father, what shall become of us?"

"I see nothing for us but to gradually sink into slavery, as has been done by so many of our class."

Culpurnia could only obey her father's order. Passing over the ground between her father's farm and the hill on which stood the castle, she was starting up the incline when she met a young man coming down. He saluted her and asked her where she was going. She told him that she was going to the castle to see Fabius to tell him that her father must make up a deficiency in the taxes he was unable to collect and would sell his farm for the purpose.

"I have just come from the castle," said the young man, "and Fabius is not there. Return to your home and go again tomorrow, when you will see him."

So Culpurnia turned back, and the youth walked beside her. He told her that Fabius was a very grasping man and would make very hard terms with her father, to which she replied that the terms would make no difference, for her father would be obliged to sell her into slavery and was himself old and broken in health, so that he had at most but a few years to live.

When they reached a point where the roads parted the young man took leave of the girl, expressing his sorrow at her misfortune. Culpurnia went home and told her father why she had returned without going to the castle.

The next morning the young man whom Culpurnia had met came to the farmhouse.

"How much," he asked, "is the deficiency in the taxes your father must return to the government?"

"Twenty thousand aesteres," replied the girl.

The young man turned a wallet upside down over the table and dropped a heap of coins.

"Count from this enough to discharge the debt and if there is anything over keep it till I return."

And so the sale of the farm and Culpurnia into slavery was avoided at the time. The young man who had furnished the money to pay the taxes came occasionally to the house and told Culpurnia that when they needed more money to let him know and on no account to go to Fabius, who would take their farm and send them out into slavery.

There was no courtship among the Romans, marriage being arranged by parents. Betrothed persons did not even usually see each other till they came together to be married. One day an uncle of Culpurnia came to the farm and, after an interview with her father, it was announced to Culpurnia that a marriage had been arranged for her. This lifted a burden from her shoulders, but cast her into gloom, because she had come to love the young man who had loaned the money for the taxes. ### Democrats are Boastful.

Saturday there was an unusually large number of farmers and county town residents in the city, part of whom came to transact business, others to learn political conditions. All the outside candidates were on the streets as were also the North Platte candidates and for the first time during the campaign political activity was noticeable. Democrats were boastful as to the outcome of today's election, claiming the certainty of electing at least four of their candidates—Miss Chapel, Mr. Cochran, Judge Grant and Mr. White—and a fighting chance for the whole ticket.
